In 1983, Porter was representing her client, Gary Dotson, in a murder trial. Dotson had been convicted of murdering Cathleen Crowell, and Porter was attempting to get the conviction overturned on appeal.

During the trial, Porter learned that a key witness, Deanna Laney, had recanted her testimony. Porter did not disclose this information to the prosecution, and Dotson was eventually acquitted.

The prosecution later discovered Laney's recantation and brought charges against Porter for obstruction of justice. Porter was convicted and sentenced to two years in prison.

The Porter obstruction case was a landmark case in the area of legal ethics. It was the first time that a lawyer had been convicted of obstruction of justice for failing to disclose exculpatory evidence.

The case also raised important questions about the issue of gender discrimination in the legal profession. Porter argued that she was treated more harshly than a male lawyer would have been in the same situation.

The Porter obstruction case had a significant impact on the legal profession. It led to new ethical rules governing the disclosure of exculpatory evidence. It also raised awareness of the issue of gender discrimination in the legal profession.
